Guadalupe slashed its COVID-19 case rate. Here's how the town did it

Veronica Tavena-Perez thought she would be staying home to care for her 3-year-old son after retiring in November from her job as a social worker for the Pascua Yaqui Tribe.

She was at home watching a movie with her son when the phone rang one day in late May. Guadalupe Mayor Valerie Molina was on the line, and asked to meet at Town Hall the following day.

Guadalupe, a town of about 6,600 residents tucked along Interstate 10 between Tempe and Chandler, was in trouble.

COVID-19 cases were spiking in the community that is mostly Hispanic, Native American or a combination of the two. Multiple generations of families often live together and many residents are service workers, deemed essential in the pandemic.

Studies are showing the novel coronavirus has disproportionately affected Native American and Hispanic communities.

They needed a trusted voice in the community to lead efforts to reduce the virus's spread, the mayor told her.

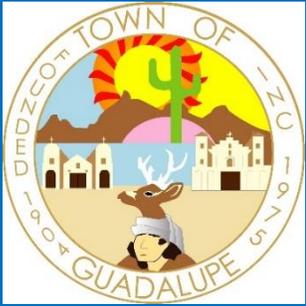

Tavena-Perez, a Guadalupe native, accepted.

"I have worked in the community for the past 40 years," she said. "I had to help."

Around the time she returned to work in June, the town had 87 confirmed cases. The number of cases reached 131 by June 16 before the COVID-19 Response Team she leads saw things begin to improve.
